A SURPRISING TRUTH: You don't need to study more English.

Do you sit in English meetings with thoughts locked in your head? Do you watch as others speak first, feeling that moment of hesitation that costs you the chance to contribute?

This isn't about better English—it's about breaking free from the hesitation trap.

Truth: Our research reveals something surprising—over 76% of global executives aren't asking for "better English."

What do executives really want?

"Raise your profile: speak up, share opinions and contribute, without being asked."

This workshop tackles the real problem—not your language skills, but the hesitation keeping your valuable insights hidden.

In meetings, do you sometimes...

- Hesitate to speak up?
- Find it difficult to disagree?
- Wait for someone to ask you a question?
- Feel uncomfortable jumping into discussions?
- Have trouble following the details of the conversation?

If you answer "yes" to any of these, you're not alone.

This is a communication challenge, not a language barrier.

The Typical SpeakUp Experience: Kenji's Journey

When Kenji attended global meetings, he would sit silently despite having valuable insights. After completing the workshop, he didn't suddenly speak "better English"—instead, he learned to use the English he already had more confidently.

In his next global discussion, he confidently jumped in with clarifying questions and used the "Opinion Sandwich" method to share his perspectives diplomatically.

His manager noticed immediately: "Kenji now actively engages in discussions with the English he already had. He's not speaking 'better English'—he's using what he knows more confidently and effectively."

Kenji reflects: "Before, I spent too long making grammar perfect in my head. Now I understand that confidence matters more than perfection. My comments have impact, even using the same English I had before. I don't hesitate to speak up, so meetings are less stressful."
